

Mail Express[®] Integrates with Antivirus and DLP Tools

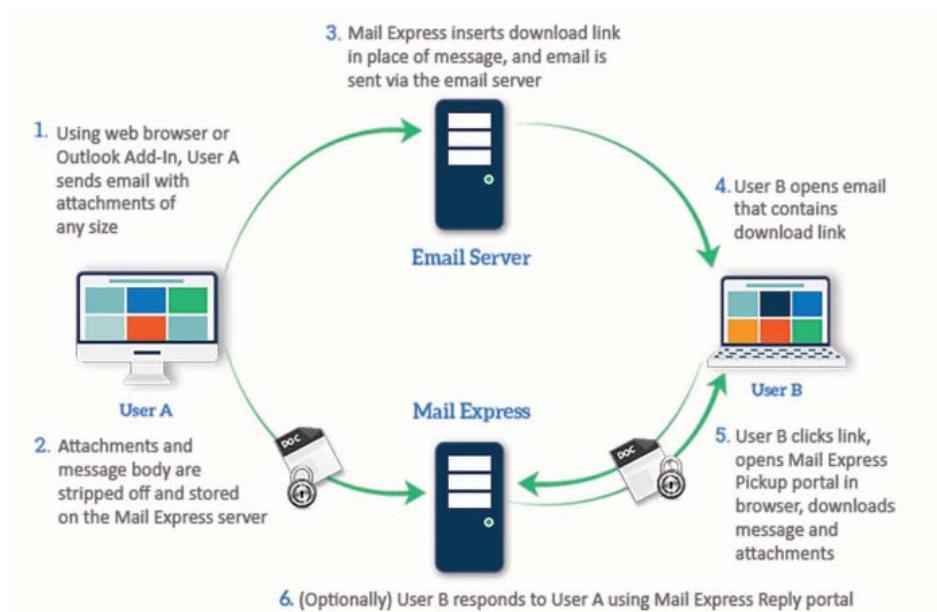

Permit or prevent transfers based on policies

A mid-market North American marketing firm is leveraging Mail Express[®] from Globalscape to deliver large, confidential media files. With Mail Express, the company has been able to eliminate insecure cloud-based consumer file-sharing use, minimize delays and frustration, and maximize satisfaction of both internal employees and external clients.

Marketing firms create and must deliver large files that are also typically confidential. Most office workers and creative professionals tend to default to email or consumer cloud file sharing websites, neither of which are secure. Plus, the nearly universal 10MB limit for attachments removes email as a possibility even for those who do not value security highly. But that limit is almost always exceeded when sending video, high resolution images, photoshoot results, branding packages, and so on.

How Does Mail Express[®] Secure Large Email Messages?

If the sender has selected the secure message body when creating the email, Mail Express strips off the message body and any attachments, no matter the size, and encrypts the message and attachments. Mail Express then sends a download link to the recipient(s). Recipient(s) click the link in the email (in any email application, including mobile), which opens the Mail Express Pickup portal in their default browser. In the Pickup portal, they can download the message and the attachment. They can respond to the email in their default email application or the Mail Express Reply portal (if configured).

Mail Express also offers integration with virus scanners and Data Leak Prevention tools, which allows users to permit or prevent transfers based on policies. This means employees won't expose recipients to malware, or inadvertently share confidential or proprietary information. Plus, Mail Express allows up to a 4GB file upload in a web browser without using a Java applet. With Mail Express, creative professionals, account managers, accountants, and HR professionals can all send secure messages and large or sensitive attachments quickly and easily, making Mail Express a convenient, secure, and compliant file sharing solution that can keep the creative process flowing.
